The European Outdoor Film Tour (E.O.F.T.) will be back on tour from 11 October, 2014: the two-hour program will present the best outdoor sports and adventure films of the year, for example the kayaking adventure „Nobody's River“:

In a place where the sun rises in the South, the land is vast, the sky is limitless and the people are more helpful than where Amber Valenti comes from: “There’s magic here. I feel it everywhere.” Whether the magic she felt when she arrived in Mongolia actually exists, is not for us to decide. But one thing is clear: their river safari down the Amur River turned the four kayakers’ world upside down more than once. And not just because the cardinal points are skewed on the compass that the nomads use here.

„Nobody's River“ tells the story of four women who want to follow the Amur River from its source to its mouth: it’s a kayaking adventure during which nothing goes exactly as planned. Although there is not even one dam that blocks the course of the 3000-kilometer river, lots of other obstacles stand in their way—especially in the heads of the kayakers. The expedition is overshadowed by a heavy blow of fate even before the adventure, but they set out anyway. Surprised by Mongolian hospitality and fascinated by their strange sporting competitions, they conclude that it’s often the small things that determine the success of an expedition. Small things such as sub-zero temperatures. The ambitious climbing project of Will Gadd from Canada at Helmcken Falls (“The Frozen Titans”) stands or falls with them. 141 meters high, overhanging and in the shade of a thundering waterfall—a dream route in the summer. But unfortunately Will Gadd has to wait for winter until he can climb here. Only when the spray has frozen up the loose rock behind the waterfall will he be able to set out. Naturally, cold and ice do not stop at Will’s fingers, toes and ropes.

Just as in (ice) climbing, minor injuries are part of the game in mountain biking. However, for Brandon Semenuk’s “Rad Company” this is no reason to hold back in any way during their wild trips through the forest or a slopestyle session on a scrap yard...

Also part of the program: “Don’t Look Down”, “El Sendero Luminoso”, and many more. Visit www.eoft.eu/de/programm for up-to-date information.
